WEDNESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 17

LONDON THEATRES .- There is something quite amszing to an American in a London theatre, in all their essential respects. What is popularly termed the "pit" that is the parquet or floor, is nearest the stage-offers the best opportunity for seeing and hearing, and yet is not more than half or quarter as expensive as the first tier or gallery just above it. The first gallery is the most expensive and fashionable portion of the house. No woman is allowed to wear a hat or bonnet in the balcony. Above is another balcony less expensive, and where a hat may be worn. The galleries decrease in price until the one next to the roof is reached, which is for the populace. Here shirt sleeves, lunches, bottled beer and randemonium E. J. MILLER & CO'S. generally prevail without limit.

What is so very singular to an American is the contrast between the lower gallery and the pit which spreads out in front of it. In the former nearly everypody is in fu'l dress, while in the latter the independent Brition of the male persuasion is just as liable at not to sit all through the performance without removing his hat-especially if it be a silk one and quite new and shiny, and generally of a kind which he fancies is liable to attract attention. It is no uncommon thing to see one of these gentlemen, between the acts, rise in his seat, turn, face the audience, and then go over carefully each gal-

Generally the individual who does this has a glass screwed so artistically in one of his eyes, his hair parted so exactly in the middle, and plastered down so tightly to his head, his atti-tude is so effective, that I always fancy he rises to be seen rather than to see, and that he scans the audience solely for the purpose of discovering whether or not he is attracting a large amount of admiration.
